In collaboration with the Asian Pacific American Network of Oregon (APANO) and Mural Arts Institute in Philadelphia (MAI), Midori Hirose's Furin Project involves honoring the history and legacy of the Japanese American Farming community. This year-long community art and place-making project engage contemporary questions on how the longstanding Orchards of SE 82nd Ave and surrounding area continue to serve as sites of community nourishment.

Furin Project involved a series of free ceramic bell-making workshops that invite the public to introduce interpretations of Furin, Japanese "wind bells," which historically were hung from trees in Japan. The project was conceived with the goal of building community connections and engaging in discussions about Indigenous stewardship, past and present, and future of the SE Portland area. Continuing the interactive process of creative exchange, at the exhibition's closing, the bells will be distributed to clay workshop participants, with each participant receiving a fellow community member's bell.
