One of the most important things to me is to engaging children creatively and show them forms of art that aren’t normally taught in school.

For four hours a day for five days, I taught a circus camp to children six to eight years old. I taught them circus history, different circus skills, and how to perform which culminated into a show performed by the children.

The Circus Camp taught the children body awareness, teamwork, collaboration, improvisational skills, and self-confidence.

The camp engaged the children in a way they might not have been before. Not only did they make their own art, but they also performed it to other camp kids and to their loved ones.